"In rowing, we look backwards in order to see how far we've come,
instead of seeing how far we still have to go."

-Anon.

Oxford, England is a true museum of architecture, where old and new collaborate to form a lively, diverse town full of history and culture.

As one element which connects many of the Oxford citizens, the sport of rowing is widely popular, around which surrounds a type of cult.

Between daily tours to various architectural icons, we will design a rowing club along the banks of the Thames, concentrating on the visual structure and how it defines the space and its relationship to the site.
